THE YALE
REVIEW

Edited by WILBUR CROSS

"Every American wishing for his country a foremost place in the world of letters is glad that The Yale Review exists. It occupies a field peculiarly its own and fills a want of many years standing."

Colonel E. M. House.

IN these days of much magazine reading there is a distinct demand for a broad and dignified quarterly affording the intellectual public an American counterpart of the British and Continental Reviews. Such a magazine is The Yale Review.

IT is no sense a college publication, but a National Quarterly. No other magazine is quite like it. It supplements, in its more broadly treated papers, your favorite weekly and monthly reading. It keeps you in touch with the world of letters and affairs. In its dignity of form and charm of presentation and in its remarkable group of contributors this magazine stands above any American periodical.

Some of the contributors to recent numbers are H. G. Wells, Hilaire Belloc, Edwin Grant Conklin, Agnes Repplier, Jane Addams, Rev. Francis E. Clark, Emma Ponafidine, Henry van Dyke, R. C. Leffingwell, Frederick Jackson Turner.

Articles to appear in early numbers of The Yale Review are:

The Weather Chart of Population by C. Reinold Noyes.

Mr. Noyes discusses the problem of over-population chiefly as it menaces the United States.

The Recall to Theology by Francis G. Peabody.

Dr. Peabody boldly challenges recent tendencies in the Church.

The New Knowledge of the Atom by W. L. Bragg.

Professor Bragg is one of the leading authorities on radio-activity.

The humorous Essay by Wilbur Cross.

A discussion of recent American humor.
